designed for Windows and Mac. After last week's revelations that a well-known pornographic actress has sent customers' credit card information to an online retailer that specializes in adult toys and other sex-related goods, the company's stock has plummeted nearly 22 percent. It's yet another reminder that as adults increasingly rely on technology to do things they used to do at home, their privacy, lives and finances have been put at risk. In recent weeks, other companies have suffered similar meltdowns. Earlier this month, a gamer noticed that his password to a popular website for military veterans turned up on AdultSwim.com after he entered it into a fake email account he created with a website called DomainWhores. The same thing happened earlier in the year when users realized that multiple media sites were capturing their screen names, passwords and user IDs when they logged into their accounts. And just last week, a U.K.-based service that offers to verify real estate investors provided a week's worth of names, email addresses and phone numbers to the hackers who breached the company's database. (Read more: Here's how the Internet changes your view of privacy) "The thing that's so scary about this is that it's so easy to commit a terrible mistake and not realize it," said Justin Patchin, director of the digital forensics and fraud team at Javelin Strategy & Research. "It's really scary and something we haven't had to deal with before because of the Internet's positive nature. We're going to be dealing with it in the future as hackers become more sophisticated." Once hackers take someone's personal information, the scope of what they can do with it is almost limitless. Last year, a couple who bought a $300 laptop online were shocked to find that the device was brimming with intimate photos and videos of a female friend the couple had hired to take pictures in their home. The hacker had been using 50b96ab0b6
