This invention relates to an apparatus and method for analyzing and testing the characteristics of optics such as, for example, the percentage of incident light passing through an optical system which is redirected to a desired beam path. The use of optical systems for the transmission of a beam of light to an optical detector is well known. For example, in one type of optical semiconductor circuit, light emitting diodes (LED's) are used as optical sources and the light is guided via lenses and other optical components to an optical detector. In one prior art semiconductor circuit, this procedure is repeated for each LED until the entire circuit is illuminated. Optical components, such as lenses, prisms, mirrors and optical fibers are required in any type of optical system. Because such components are typically made of hard material, the components can be quite costly. Particularly in optical communication systems, it is necessary to provide circuits and devices for isolating, redirecting
